by Edward W. Redfield and a piece of ancient armor.

The painting by Redfield was a gift to the museum by Mrs. E. H. Harriman. It is called "Overlooking the Valley" and is a characteristic picture of the serily spring, with bare trees and melting snow. The color scheme is sopia and white: the foreground so heavily loaded with paint that it seems to be literally modelled in relief.

The specimen of armor is a seventeenth century collar plate, of sumptuous of this city. It belongs to one of the latest periods of armor, when the craft of the armores was already decadent and splendid work lingered only in exceptional places. The present object, as an instance, is made with more thought of ornament than of service, and is constructed of copper instead of the more serviceable steel. The copper lends itself. of ornament than of service, and is con-structed of copper instead of the more serviceable steel. The copper lends itself more easily to the hand of the embosser and also accepts the gilding better than iron, guarding its brilliancy to a re-markable degree.

The decoration of the collar plate is most elaborate, and Dr. Dean, curator of armor in the museum, regards it as a masterpiece of workmanship of its
